
The Money Creation Confession

What the Federal Reserve admitted, and the banking system buried

Blurb

Every time you sign a loan document, a bank creates money from nothing — your signature is the instrument that brings it into existence, and the Federal Reserve's own published workbook documented this fact in plain language for thirty-one years without ever being required to tell you. In December 1968, a bank president sat under oath in a Minnesota courtroom and admitted exactly how it works — the jury found the mortgage void, and within months the banking establishment had nullified the verdict, destroyed the attorney's career, and explicitly ordered courts never to cite the case again. This book assembles everything they hoped you would never connect — the Federal Reserve's own admission, the Bank of England's independent confirmation, the sworn banker's testimony, the erased court verdict, and the commercial law framework that governs every loan document you have ever signed — and presents it as the complete documented record of the most consequential financial truth never disclosed to the American borrower. The pamphlet was always on the shelf. This book makes sure you finally read it.
